Great Autumn Maneuvers of the German Soldiers.

REVIEWED BY THE KAISER

Two Large Armies Will Advance, One From the North, the Other From the South-Swamps for Engineers to Cross-Sale of Arms to Arabian Slave Dealers Denied.

Berlin, Aug. 31.-The importance and nagnitude of the forthcoming great autumn maneuvers, called the "Kabser maneuvers," because of the circumstance that the kniserin person attends them and reviews the troops participating, is made clear by a plain statement of figures.

The south army, advancing from the south and southwest, is composed of the third army corps and the Imperial Guards. The latter, with its ordinary reserve strength haitalions, or quarter battalions as they are termed, filled up to full battalions, number therefore nine regiments of infantry of four buttnilons each, or thirty-six buttations of infantry, one of rifle guards, one of chassears, eight regiments of cavalry, two regiments of field artillery and one battalion ach of engineers and commissariat.

The third army corps, leaving its skeleton quarter battations in the garrisons, will. number eight regiments of infantry of three tattalions each, or twenty-four battalions of infantry, one battalion of chasseurs, four regiments of cavalry and two of field artillery and the single battalion each of engineers and commissarist.

THE SOUTH ARMY. The total strength of the South Army mounts, therefore, to sixty battations of dantry and three of rifles and chasseurs. tweive envolvy regiments, four artificry regiments, and two bartalions each of enringers and commissariat.

The North Army, marching from the east, north and northwest, is composed of the Second and Ninth army corps. The Second army corps will number eight regi-ments, organized like the guards of four ballations such, or thing-two fatialions of infantry, four regiments of cavalry, two regiments of field artitlery and single battations of engineers and commissionat.

The Ninth army corps is composed of eight regiments, each consisting of three full battalious and a skyleton fattalion, the latter being the much-discussed Fourth battalian. This amounts to twenty-four full buttallens and right skeletons, in addition to which the coups has a chassen battallen, four regiments of cavalry, two of field artillery and a field battallen nen of engineers and commissions.

The North Army will therefore aggregate fifty-six battalions and eight skeleton battalions of infantryl and one of chasents, eight regiments of cavalry and four of field artiflery and the two hattailons regiments of railway troops and a battalion
